From Fields to Ballots: Droughts and Electoral Shifts in Brazil

⊕ Wicksell Prize, EPCS Conference, 2026

⊕ Best Poster Award, ICDE Conference, 2025

Climate change is expected to intensify droughts in developing countries, where rural livelihoods remain highly dependent on rainfed agriculture. This paper studies how growing-season droughts affect voting behavior in Brazil. Using high-resolution weather data matched with presidential election results between 2002 and 2022, I exploit within-municipality variation in hydrological stress aligned with crop-specific growing seasons. I find that drier growing seasons systematically reduce support for green and left-leaning coalitions. Evidence suggests that these effects operate through declines in agricultural income, with stronger electoral penalties in smallholder-dominated areas.
